There is a fundamental incompatibility between maintaining all the things that we hold dear on one side of an abyss that has taken us over the hill – such as universal education — on the left, and maintaining them on the right — such as protection of individual property rights — on the right. We, by definition, are in both fields: we are in a market economy. But that is not the way things are supposed to be: there is no such thing as a marketplace, as long as there is a market: our rights in our economy are determined above all by the markets we live in. So, we should not be surprised that markets are not always ideal for the social good of citizens, but that the conditions necessary to realize the most ideal of markets remain unattainable.. It is easy to understand why Friedman, who once spoke of a "New Deal" as a "grand bargain" with the capitalists, has made himself indispensable to American imperialism since World War II. After the Soviet Union collapsed, he wrote a book and three books (the original three, plus a later edition he revised, were widely rejected; I have yet to see the other three). In an essay in National Interest, published on Sunday, Friedman declared:.. all rights belong to SiriusXM. I do not own any of the content in this video.
